THE TEXT

1-A report released by the computer company Apple, Inc. states that more than 600 schools nationwide have bought iPads for all of their students. And it is not happening just in rich suburbs. Schools in poor areas round New York City and Chicago are also handing up iPads.

2-Last month, Burlington High School launched a one-to-one iPad programme to provide a tablet for each student. “This cost the school about $ 500 000 for the devices”, said Patrick Larkin, head of the school, “but we saved money by abandoning plans to build a new language laboratory and deciding we would no longer buy new textbooks.”

3-Larkin also said that both students and teachers no longer need to buy textbooks as they can find everything online. He added that the school is not even buying electronic versions of textbooks, since they end up costing the schools more than traditional ones in the long run.

4-Teachers were initially doubtful of the change. Ted Whitten, head of the language department, said he was afraid the students would spend all their time playing video games and texting friends. But he said if teachers stay attentive, they can keep their students focused. He added if kids start getting distracted by the iPads, the teacher just needs to make sure they turn them off.

5-The project is just in its first year, but Larkin said, “so far, kids seem to be doing better with the iPads. But Burlington might not be an all-iPad school forever. You never know what the next technology will be.”
